

How to use Rabb.it: Some fundamental ideas

Rabbit, also named Rabb.it, was a popular mobile application and video streaming website that came into existence in 2014. Based out of California, US, Rabbit allowed countless users to distantly surf and view the same content simultaneously.

How to use Rabb.it: Some basic facts

To use Rabb.it, a host had to generate a room and send requests to others to join it. As a substitute, the host can make the room open to the public so that it is noticeable on the homepage of the site. In this way, anybody can participate in this room and share content with the help of a virtual machine known as “Rabbitcast”. Alternatively, they can also use the “Share on Rabbit” Google Chrome extension. A sign-up option with Facebook was also available for the users.

Using the rabbit chrome extension is easy. Viewers just need to open their chosen website in another tab. In it, they have to click the rabbit extension icon and subsequently, “start sharing”. It would open the video on Rabb.it. Nonetheless, the original tab has to remain open.

No matter what content the host shares, the same gets visible to the other participants of the rabb.it rooms together with visuals and sound. Rabb.it rendered audiovisuals and text messages together with this feature.

Rabbit did not introduce the content watched on it and this is different from other well-admired streaming sites like Netflix and YouTube. Rather, it streamed Rabbitcast, which is a virtual machine equipped with a web browser. Users utilized this browser to redirect to other content and sites.

The Rabbitcast served as a Rabb.it- launched, common Firefox browser that anybody in the room could watch and regulate. There was a pre-installed advertisement blocker or ad filter in the in-built web browser.
